

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD
PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 98TH CONGRESS

SENATE

BILL	DATE	PAGE(S)
S. 645	March 1, 1983	S1947-56

Action:

Introduced by Mr. Dole, et al.
General Accounting Office reference, p. S1953(3), S1954(1)

The most significant of the reforms included in the package is the creation of an intercourt tribunal to exercise jurisdiction over cases referred to it by the Supreme Court.

The purpose of the tribunal is to relieve the dramatically increased workload of the Supreme Court. In recent months, in highly unusual fashion, eight Justices of the Court have spoken publicly about the problem of docket congestion. A few weeks ago, the Chief Justice of the United States specifically endorsed the creation of a temporary intercourt tribunal to help alleviate the growing overload.

For years, judicial commentators and scholars have tracked the alarming rise in the number of cases before the Court. In the Court's past session, there were more than 6,000 petitions for certiorari, an increase of more than 80 percent over the past 10 years. Of sheer necessity, an increasing number of these requests for High Court review were decided in summary, or per curiam fashion.

Almost 10 years ago, the Hruska Commission, which was established to study the Federal appellate system, recommended that a national court of appeals be created to serve as a safety valve for an increasingly overloaded and overworked Supreme Court. In the intervening years, the pressures which led to this recommendation have intensified and the Hruska proposal has continued to receive interest and support. In this and the past Congress, Senator HEFLIN, the ranking minority member of the Courts Subcommittee, has proposed the creation of a permanent National Court of Appeals along the lines recommended by the Hruska Commission, and his well-recognized expertise in this area was instrumental in the development of this intercourt tribunal proposal.

The intercourt tribunal can be an important new tool to ease the alarming burdens on the Court.

The elements of the proposal are straight-forward: A temporary court would be created for a 5-year period to settle important matters referred to it by the Supreme Court. The proposal follows the recommendations of the Hruska Commission in that the tribunal would have no original jurisdiction. It would decide only cases which the Supreme Court referred to it by majority vote. The Supreme Court would retain the power to overrule or modify any decision of the tribunal, consistent with its constitutional role as the highest court in the land.

The circuit council of each circuit court of appeals would nominate two judges to sit on the 26-member tribunal. Five judge panels would then be formed within the tribunal to hear and decide cases. No two judges from the same circuit could sit on the same panel. Judges would be designated to sit on panels by a lottery system in such a way that all judges of the tribunal would hear and decide cases that

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. HEFLIN, and Mr. THURMOND):

S. 645. A bill to establish an intercourt tribunal, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COURT IMPROVEMENTS ACT OF 1983

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators HEFLIN and THURMOND, I am pleased to introduce the Court Improvements Act of 1983.

represent all types of cases before the tribunal.

The legislation also incorporates Senator HEFLIN's proposal to establish a Chancellor of the United States who would be appointed by the Chief Justice from among circuit judges in regular active service. The Chancellor would be responsible for assisting the Chief Justice with the ever increasing administrative burdens of the position of Chief Justice. He would also serve as a member of the inter-circuit tribunal and be responsible for the administration of that court.

Mr. President, this proposal constitutes a balanced and cost-efficient response to the Supreme Court's urgent need for relief from its burgeoning caseload. Because the proposal does not involve the creation of new judgeships, nor the establishment of a separate administrative support structure, its costs should be minimal. In addition, the temporary nature of the tribunal should address the reservations of some about creating a new appellate layer to the Federal court structure in the form of a permanent National Court of Appeals. Rather, this 5-year experiment will provide the Congress with needed information concerning the feasibility and wisdom of taking such a step. At the same time, the tribunal will provide desperately needed additional decisional capacity for the resolution of disputes where nationwide uniformity is needed, many of which are now left unresolved because the Supreme Court cannot make room on its docket.

The remaining components of this court improvements package consist of proposals which are similar or identical to bills which were introduced in the last Congress. All were mentioned in the year end report of the Chief Justice as needed improvements in judicial administration.

First, title I would eliminate the mandatory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Under current law, certain cases may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court and the Court is obligated to hear and decide them. The majority of these cases do not involve important issues, are summarily dealt with, and essentially serve only to clog the Court's docket. Identical proposals have passed at least one House of Congress in the past three Congresses.

Title II would eliminate most civil priorities. Over the past several years, the Congress has enacted so many statutory provisions requiring the courts to give expedited consideration to certain civil cases, that they have become virtually meaningless. Title II would eliminate all these identified priorities, except for habeas corpus, civil rights, and FOIA cases, and applications for temporary restraining orders or injunctions. A proposal virtually identical to title II passed the House last year as part of the Railroad court reform package.

Title III would make certain improvements to judicial survivor's benefits to make them more comparable to those provided by State judicial systems and in private law practice. These improvements should help turn the tide on the increasing number of Federal judges resigning and help maintain the high caliber of those accepting appointments to the Federal bench. Included in the improvements are: Basing children's annuities on a percentage of salary, as opposed to a fixed dollar amount; creating a minimum annuity of 30 percent of salary for surviving spouses; and increasing the factoring figure upon which surviving spouses' annuities are based. Participating judges would be required to contribute an increased percentage of their salary to help offset additional costs.

Title IV would create a State justice institute. This nonprofit corporation would administer federally funded assistance programs to State courts to improve judicial administration at the State level. It is identical to a bill introduced by Senator HEFLIN, and which passed the Senate in the last Congress.

Title V would create a temporary Federal courts study commission to look beyond the immediate problems confronting the judiciary and to undertake comprehensive, long-range planning. Specifically, the major purposes of the commission would be to conduct a 2-year study of the jurisdiction of the Federal and State courts, appraise the problems confronting the courts and develop a long-range plan for their future needs. The bipartisan commission would consist of 14 members appointed by the heads of the three branches of Government, and would submit periodic reports on the state of the judiciary and a final report at the end of 10 years. It is identical to a proposal sponsored by Senators THURMOND and HEFLIN which passed the Senate last year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:
